236 Wool is also very important to the economy of Awlad Ali. Lamb's 286 wool is either sold or spun and woven into rugs. Goat's wool is spun and woven to provide the cover for the tents.

231 Sheep and goats are rarely slaughtered for meat except on special [262] occasions. Most male and many female lambs and kids are sold in the [432] market and the money is used to buy the necessary supply of food (like [438] tea, sugar, salt, etc.), clothes, and other household items. Most of 438 these items are obtained from the shops in the settled communities in 439 the area, although some of the major items can be obtained only from 443 large urban centers like Alexandria.

231 The other domesticated animals that Awlad Ali keep are the donkey 492 for transport and riding, a few camels for heavy transport and also for [236] wool, very few horses for riding on special occasions (they are con-[554] sidered as a status symbol for those who own them), and the dog to guard the camp and to protect the herds from wolves and other predators.
235 Poultry are usually kept for meat and eggs which are sometimes sold by 432 the women in the nearby markets.

233 The main occupation in the area is stock raising. Grazing lands
137 extend generally south of the cultivated land in the northern strip.
[132] The growth of pasture plants is affected by the amount of rainfall in a particular year. Low rainfall causes acute shortages of pasture and herbage, and leads to the death of animals by both starvation and thirst. Pasture plants comprise a wide variety of bushes, scrub, and many other species of grasses, most of which have a very short life span. These plants normally persist from December to May; then the land is turned into arid, hard desert with only a few dispersed patches of dry grass.
